Its administration was handed over to the younger business man, who stood exactly in the father's place, paying the bills, advising the selfish family and trying to keep down its extravagance. How he did this made its extravagance. How he did this made up the new comedy by Guy Bollon and George Middleton, and, moreover, it is entirely proper to add, highly amused the spectators who witnessed the first production of the piece. Not this season has such genuine laughter been heard in a playhouse as that which followed the efforts of this powerhold to find a the efforts of this household to find a means of earning a living. Here the entertainment was

Three Acts of Good Comedy.

Throughout the evening, indeed, there was most excellent discussion. Just why Robert Milton, the stage manager, elected to have the three acts played at such a slow tempo it is not easy to tell. But the actors, and of course the drama But the actors, and of course the drama-itself, proceeded at a snail's pace. Half the fun of the labor seeking scene came from the sudden accelerance at this point. The actors for the first time seemed to shake off their lethargy. "Adam and Eva" woke up.

The authors have in their new play vivaciously traventied some of the fall-ings of stage men and women, which have not escaped the attention of their fellow craftsmen in the past. There is the painful lot of the rich who have only noney to spend, there are the faithless suitors who scurry away the minute there is a suggestion of waning fortunes, there is the honest young man with his own sentimental ideas of a modest home, and above all, the view of the family at Its lazy members have been brought by the father pro tem. to a New Jersey farm. Chickens and bees are occupying the attention of the women while the English son-in-law sells "snappy" clothing, the hypochondriacal uncle peddles life insurance and the Scottish earl is prospering with a livery stable. Of course there has been no real loss of fortune. Of course the young jusiness manager has arranged all this transformation of the family. Of course it was the fault of the real father now returned from the rubber plantations of South America that the family was after all so self-indulgent and so extravagant. It must be taken just as much a matter of course the vision of the real family was after all so self-indulgent and so extravagant. It must be taken just as much a matter of course the vision of the real family was after all so self-indulgent and so extravagant. It must be taken just as much a matter of course the vision of the wife with the authentic touch of naturaliness—in fact, she is a vixen to the life. The supporting cast, including Armand Kaliz, Wyndham Standing, Ben Hendricks and E. Jensen, stand by hef gallantly though the picture. The story, which is the work of John Emerson and Anita Leos, can be recommended to all prospective brides and bridegrooms as a test for their nerve.

An Outing-Chester scenic, "When It's Time to Retire," shows some interesting views of Zulus in their native boundoirs.

indulgent and so extravagant. It must be taken just as much a matter of course that the wise young man who had brought about all these changes was in love with the heroine and she in love with him. So her fortune seeking lover who had shown himself a real man retired in favor of the savior of the family. After all the family fortune, moreover, had not been lost. ver, had not been lost.

The Acting of the Play.

All this material might not have met with the great success it found on Sat-urday merely on account of its familiarwithout the deft and humorous touch of the two authors. Then the excellent acting of the entire personnel was a de-light in itself. Otto Kruger brought youth and intelligence to the role of the prematurely wise young man of business and Ruth Shepley, who has gained in re-source with no loss of her girlish prettiwho of course had her heart always where it should be. Roberta Arnold, pretty, so grotesque in gesture at times as to suggest that Charlotte Greenwood is her artistic model and original in her manner of speech, with Reginald Mason formed the married couple of the fam-ily. The most artistic of the women was Jean Shelby, who as the self-sacrificing maid in love with the hero, led him to the heiress's side. She was not only plausible and humorous but read her lines with real naturalness. There was an irresistible plaintiveness about her impersonation too. Ferdinand Gott-schalk, irresistibly funny as the old parasite; Courtensy Foote, as novel in his treatment of the lord as the role itself was, and Richard Sterling, with his dry humor as the physician, these were figures in a success that is certain to endure as long as the best of them.

York music lovers have not now to make their first acquaintance with the masterpleces of the Catholic Church, but to hear them sung by artificial male voices is a novelty.

The ainging of the quartet was inter-

The finest achievement was the delivery of Vittoria's "O vos omnes qui transitis per viam," in which the intensity of the expression, somewhat theatrical in character, as the Sistine style commonly is, was noteworthy. The four voices are wanting in freshness They show signs of long and hard isage, and the soprano in particular is

OF SAUL GOMPERS PERSHING A PLAIN CITIZEN YESTERDAY

Receives Callers, Makes a Few Visits and Goes to Church.

WRITES MANY LETTERS

To-day General Will Inspect Offices in the New A. E. F. Headquarters.

Special Despatch to Tan Sun. WASHINGTON, Sept. 14.-Gen. Pershing became Citizen Pershing of Washington at least temporarily to-day. Where yesterday he faced cheering crowds all over town, from Secretary of War Baker's office to the baseball park, to-day he went to church, motored about the city, received visitors, did a little visiting himself and wrote a lot of letters-in short, pursued the Sunday programme of an ordinary resident.

This morning Gen. Pershing attended services in the Church of the Epiphany.

After church he rode about town with his official party of aids.

Callers at the General's apartments at the Shoreham took up the afternoon. Among the visitors were some of much distinction and others who were just distinction and others who were just friends of the "Black Jack" Pershing of
